St. Petersburg Police asks for help to focus on crime with Eagle Eye, the department’s new security camera registry

In a new initiative called Eagle Eye, St. Petersburg Police is asking residents and businesses to register their camera's location on the SPPD website. It involves filling out a simple form. There is no cost and the information is kept confidential.

Security cameras can provide crucial clues to solving crimes. But often investigators waste valuable time trying to locate nearby surveillance cameras that may have captured video.

Most recently a similar registry helped Philadelphia police locate video of the kidnapping of a young woman off a public sidewalk.

A Property Crimes Officer will be available to talk to the media about the benefits, please call us to set up a time.
